Obligations for business owners

If you're an employer, you're responsible for fire safety in your commercial premises. Even in shared buildings or small offices, you have an obligation to meet legal requirements under the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005. At best, you share these obligations with your landlord or other building occupants. In many cases, you're solely responsible – and solely accountable for failings.

Safe

The legislation exists to keep you, your employees and your customers safe from harm. The right protection, prevention and procedures could be the difference between an effective response and serious injury or worse.

Legal

The legislation that surrounds fire safety is complex, but non-compliance could leave your business and reputation in tatters. We're here to guide you through it, from understand your role to implementing solutions.

Your obligations

As the responsible person for your premises, you're required to put various processes in place to protect and inform your staff and customers. The specifics will vary depending on your hazards, risk levels, and premises.

Your responsibility

Conduct and regularly review a Fire Risk Assessment

What it means in practice

- Get a qualified and capable assessor to carry out your Fire Risk Assessment
- Record the findings in a format that you can use to demonstrate compliance
- Define a schedule for review, dependant on your business and risk levels

Make staff aware of known risks

- Provide training that is tailored to your premises and business
- Use clear, compliant signage in your workplace

Implement and maintain appropriate fire safety measures

- Install fire extinguishers, methods of containment, fire suppression systems, alarms and more
- Train staff on the appropriate use of these solutions
- Service and maintain all equipment on a regular basis

Plan for an emergency

- Design and record a clear emergency plan
- Assign roles to individuals and make sure they understand what is required of them

Provide adequate fire safety training

- Get professional training on prevention, protection and intervention
- Deliver specialised training to Fire Wardens
